

The FCC's plan to force Internet/VoIP providers to provide easy surveillance for the government is entirely corrupt and wrong. For starters, you would be forcing a poor security model on the entire infrastructure, which WILL result in repeated major abuse. It is for many reasons wrong for the government to spy on its citizens. And the serious criminals will use end-to-end military-quality encryption so you'll have to resort to old fashioned microphone bugs anyway -- after having crippled the security of the national communications infrastructure. "Trust Us, We're the Government" is not what the founders of our country had in mind!
